Scientists are conducting experiments to learn the causes of tooth decay, how it develops and how to stop it. What causes tooth decay? A kind of bacteria called "S. mutans" is the main cause. S. mutans produces a substance that breaks down sugars into lactic acid which can eat away the outer covering of the tooth, the tooth enamel.

Since S. mutans gives our teeth so much trouble, a vaccine to protect against S. mutans could stop most tooth decay before it starts. Such a vaccine has been developed. Scientists injected certain rats, hamsters, and monkeys with S. mutans cells. Other animals in the test got no injections. Then, all the animals were fed food that contained a lot of sugar. The animals that received the injections had fewer cavities than the group that had no injections.
