23-25. Criticizing educational reforms has become fashionable. People blame the decline of higher education on what they see as a flawed policy of setting up a large number of colleges and universities nationwide. Although the overflow of college and higher degrees can reduce the value of such diplomas, the problem that affects their value lies in the impact of market competition under globalization, as well as the public's discordant understanding of higher education. A university diploma is no longer a ticket to a job. Perhaps the meaning of such a diploma merely lies in self-expectation: those who stop learning will soon face the pressure of being discarded. On the other hand, as more and more high-class talents are taking lower-level posts today, maybe this also means that the quality of Taiwan's overall manpower has been improved if we view this from a macroscopic perspective.

 (C) the value of university diplomas reduced (D) all above
